POST-WAR & CONTEMPORARY ART NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 2016

ARTEMUNDI

Sotheby's Contemporary Art Evening Auction in New York totaled $276.6 million with 93.8% of lots sold with a surprisingly low BI rate of 6%. Gerhard Richter's A B, Still triumphed at $34 million, with a selection of works from the Stephen & Ann Ames Collection bringing a total of $122.8 million. Rounding out the night, Andy Warhol's Self-Portrait (Fright Wig) achieved the highest total this week for a work by the artist at $24.4 million.

Phillips Contemporary Art Evening Auction netted $111.2 million in its only evening auction during the fall sales in New York, securing a total just above the pre-sale low estimate of $100 million, though short of the $144 million high estimate. With a well-manicured selection of just 37 lots, the sale successfully sold 34 of them, earning Phillips a sell-through rate of 92 percent. Phillips's evening sale included the 1963 Gerhard Richter photo-based painting Düsenjäger, valued at $25 million to $35 million, from the collection of the Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen. This painting of a fighter jet had been backed by a third-party guarantor from Asia, who bought it with a single bid of $25.6 million with fees.

Christie's Contemporary Art Evening Auction netted a total of $277.5 million at its postwar and contemporary sale in New York Tuesday night, a haul healthily over its low estimate of $216 million, though just shy of the high estimate of $296 million. By selling 54 out of its 61 lots, the auction house secured a sell-through rate of 89 percent. There were still a few highlights, included new records for five artists, most notably Willem de Kooning. His Untitled XXV (1977) hammered at $59 million, or $66.3 million with the buyer's premium, well over its pre-sale estimate of $40 million. The demand for the de Kooning was enough that its seller declined a guarantee, but there were 17 other lots were guaranteed by Christie's, or guaranteed by a third-party. Of those, only Roy Lichtenstein's Double Mirror (1970) failed to sell.
